GERALD HEILLY

PRETORIA - The Bulapatong massacre and the related political crisis would cost the country millions of rands in lost tourism revenue this year. Industry spokesmen said at the weekend. They felt the trend would intensify unless there was a significant drop in the level of violence.
Renntee Travel and Satour said there had been tour cancellations already.
Spokesman, unable to say how many bookings had been affected, said the industry had been given "a kick in the ribs".
Renata marketing GM Kathy McWhitter said the loss in foreign exchange would be counted in millions.

The company's overseas correspondents had reported that worldwide TV and radio coverage of the Bulapatong killing had been dramatic. Perceptions abroad were that the country was sliding into anarchy.
Operator: said before the massacre international market for SA tourism had been expanding. Now, although US, European and Far East markets were slowing, there was significant nervousness.

"US tourism are easily put at: by unrest," said McWhitter.

Tourist markets worldwide had started to pick up after the Gulf war slump and there had been hope that tourism would close the gap on 30 day monthly a: 8M major earner of foreign exchange.

Satour director Spencer Thomas said it was too early to say whether tour cancellations would have a "domino effect".
