capacity of all human beings for goodness. These curious folk thought it was worthwhile to try to build a land in which caring was more important than acquiring. They even considered that it was a compliment and not a sneer to be to be said to possess high ideals.

I am sure there are many of them in this shall," old and young survivors of that age.

We buried many of our comrades in far away countries. They should be honoured as patriots in a suitable way, their bodies returned to South African soil if their families so wish, or their lives honoured in some other manner. Our country has many memorials and well-tended war graves, but not one that relates to anyone who fell in the struggle against apartheid.

Bram Fischer's ashes are still entombed in a prison yard.
They should be freed to be scattered on the Free State soil that he loved so much.

We have many people, old and young, who left their studies and their jobs, separated themselves from their families, to join MK and, as they saw it and I see it, fight for freedom in their land. Just as the ex-service men and women who fought against Hitler received gratuities, housing grants and special support to make up for missed education, so should arrangements be made to recognise the years of risk and dedication spent in the service of MK.

Once upon a time, before the world was put right by the combined assault of neo-liberal certainty and post-modernist vagary, there lived a quaint people who believed in the capacity of all human beings for goodness. These curious folk thought it was worthwhile to try to build a land in which caring was more important than acquiring. They even considered that it was a compliment and not a sneer to be to be said to possess high ideals.

I am sure there are many of them in this hall, old and young survivors of that age.

We buried many of our comrades in far away countries. They should be honoured as patriots in a suitable way, their bodies returned to South African soil if their families so wish, or their lives honoured in some other manner. Our country has many memorials and well-tended war graves, but not one that relates to anyone who fell in the struggle against apartheid.

Bram Fischer's ashes are still entombed in a Prison yard. They should be freed to be scattered on the Free State soil that he loved so much.

Just as the ex-service men and women who fought against Hitler received gratuities, housing grants and special support to make up for missed education, so should arrangements be made to recognise the years of risk and dedication spent in the service of MK.

Our movement drew its strength from the fact that it was broadly based. Every philosophy of struggle, from passive resistance to armed confrontation with the state, has been represented in it. The central theme has always been the importance of achieving basic democratic rights for everybody and moving swiftly to tackle the enormous inequalities created by apartheid. Those were our pre-occupations then, and they should be our concerns now.
